LUSATIAN LAKELAND

Welcome to the Lusatian Lakeland!

Europe's largest man-made water landscape is being created between Dresden and Berlin. Where gigantic excavators used to dig through the earth, vacationers are now setting sail, going fishing, swimming or surfing. The flooding of former open-cast mines is creating a spectacular water world. By the end of the 2020s, a total of 23 lakes will form part of Germany's largest lake district.

Three lakes are already navigable today. The Koschen Canal connects Lake Senftenberg with Lake Geierswalde and the Barbara Canal connects Lake Geierswalde with Lake Partwitz. In future, more than 10 lakes with a total water surface area of approximately 7,000 hectares will be connected via navigable canals.

LAKE SENFTENBERG

Welcome to the "mother lake" of the Lusatian Lakeland!

Lake Senftenberg was created by the flooding of the former Niemtsch lignite open-cast mine between 1967 and 1972. With an area of around 1,300 hectares, it is roughly the size of 2,000 soccer pitches. There is a 250-hectare wooded island in the lake, which was declared a nature reserve in 1981 and may not be entered. Due to the exceptionally high water quality, it is possible to see up to a depth of 5 meters under favourable conditions and observe zander, pike, perch and carp.

Of the total 18 kilometers of shoreline, more than 7 kilometers are designated as a bathing beach. The town harbor was opened in Senftenberg in April 2013. A marina with over 100 boat moorings and an 80-metre-long floating pier was created.
